

Q—Today on Boston Common I saw a group of young people performing, called the Caravan Street Theater. They did satire and I thought they were marvelous. Are they connected with a professional group? Where do they come from?—L.R., Boston.

A—The Caravan Street Theater is an independent group of professional and amateur entertainers, loosely connected with the Caravan Theater of Cambridge. The group is made up of from 10 to 15 members and they perform on Boston Common and on Cambridge Common. Most of their work is politically oriented and generally reflects an opinion a little to the left of center. They pass the hat after performances to support the project.

Caravan Theater, a professional company, performs weekends at the Harvard Epworth Church in Cambridge. Their current play "How to Make a Woman" lets the audience get into the act in the discussion of Women's Lib that follows the show.
